About the production

An extract from an interview with writer Nick Dear, discussing how his version of Frankenstein fits into a long history of adaptations of Mary Shelley's story.

I think we’re doing something that hasn’t been done before [in previous productions], which is to tell the story, at least initially, from the creature’s point of view. We do start with the moment of creation but not told from the perspective of the scientists which is how it’s usually told; we tell it from the perspective of the experiment rather than the experimenter.

A great deal of what we’re trying to do in this show is to explore what it feels like to be that experiment. That was something Danny Boyle and I decided on years ago, which we felt would be a new approach to the story. We certainly don’t think it’s been done before, and we do it partly as a counter to almost all the movies, of which there are many, which usually deny the creature a voice.

National Theatre

At the National Theatre we make world-class theatre, and we make it for everyone.

We stage over 20 productions at our South Bank home in London each year. Our programme is broad and inclusive, appealing to the widest possible audiences with new plays, musicals, reimagined classics and work for young audiences. Our work is also seen in London’s West End, on tour across the UK and internationally, and through National Theatre Live broadcasts and screenings to cinemas around the world.

Whether you’ve seen our work many times or are joining us for the first time, we hope you will be entertained, challenged and inspired.
